

Transcription

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=q2eSObPEDRc>

Hello, there! Yesterday, it was the hottest day of October on record, twenty-nine point nine degrees was our high. Still a lot of warm, still a lot of sunny weather around in the forecast today and a lot of dry weather as well that is in England and Wales.

However, in the northern England, the weather is changing through the coming hours. Skies clouding over outbreaks of rain cooler here today,

But south of here for parts of the Midlands into Lincolnshire for East Anglia, many southern counties of England have a beautiful afternoon to come.

Right along the coast is always going to be cooler and fresher as the breeze starts to develop. So, if inland temperatures in the mid to high twenties are too much for you, the seaside is certainly a more refreshing place to go.

Southern Wales holding onto that warmth but North Wales, into northwest England, is where the cloud invades the Northern Ireland. Over western Scotland after a cloudy damp start the skies promising to brighten as we head through the afternoon. Over many central and eastern areas of Scotland we will stick with the pretty cloudy skies and outbreaks of rain on and off through the afternoon.

Now is where the rest of the day we will see more rain arriving through northern England and Wales is heavy at times to the southeast. Of here, it marks that barrier of hot dry and sunny cooler cloudy and damp. Now overnight this weather front sits through northern England and Wales the rain on, it will ease it always remains pretty cloudy though and again it may raise our dividing line south. Of here, a mild night come north of here slightly fresher. You can see a tinge of white just through the Irish Sea for many a bit of a mist, a bit of a murk start. And for Monday onwards, we start to have this transition in our weather back to something a little more autumnal, a little more cloudy but more rain in the forecast; and it comes into the Northwest through Monday morning northwestern areas of Scotland, western areas of Northern Ireland cloudy and wet, often windy gusts of 50 miles an hour. At times perhaps that rain continues to push into northern England and Wales, but further south we stick with that warm and sunny weather, but slowly. Surely, the sunshine will go turning cooler with rain later this week.