Letting Teenagers Live

By David Leonhardt

March 4, 2018

Heather Walsh for The New York Times

On the Saturday night of their high school's homecoming weekend in 2009, four teenagers were driving together in Coral Springs, Fla., when their Volkswagen jumped off the road and plunged into a canal. A 15-year-old in the car escaped. Three 16-year-olds — Anthony Almonte, Sean Maxey and Robert Nugent — drowned.

Some thoughts for this year's college graduates, and the community about to receive them

Much has changed about the American rite of college graduation. Station wagons have given way to SUVs, the corresponding tuition payments have a few more digits, and instead of "Pomp and Circumstance," the students now enter the ceremony to Pharrell's "Happy." (Well, at the cool commencements they do.)

So You Think You Can Just Adopt a Dog?

By ANNA BAHNEY MARCH 23, 2006

ALMOST as soon as Michele Pusateri and her two daughters chose a black-and-white terrier at a humane society shelter near their home in South Pasadena, Calif., they were told they did not qualify to own the dog.

When it comes to global warming, there often seems to be so little that we as individuals can achieve. Instead, governments and international treaties, non-governmental organisations and the environmental movement at large work on the issue on a broad scale, leaving little if anything for the rest of us to achieve. But from its earliest days, the mantra of the environmental movement has been to think global and act local. Now, given a ceremony in Wednesday in Dubai, that certainly seems to be the case, at least when it comes to the students who attend schools across the emirate.
